the 'United Kingdom'

notions of 'English heritage'

often identified with landscape, relationships with the land itself

what is English heritage?

what stands for, represents England?

what have they inherited that makes them English?

... beer, the parish church, fish and chips, cricket played upon a village green in summer, the Tower of London, the monarchy itself, stately homes, Shakespeare, a cottage garden ...

are just some of the possible answers today

Gaunt has pointed to some connections rooted in land and ownership, with references to Eden and England's breed of men, England nurturing kings the material textures of identity are centered upon the located body this is another way of thinking of notions like 'heritage' (literally what is inherited), the way identity is signified
