“Gratitude” by Cate Gerrity

My experience at Stanford started with gratitude. That immense overflowing kind where you can’t even feel anything else. I remember vividly the first Sunday of freshman year, during the “peace”, when I turned to my roommate and soon-to-be best friend. We hugged and teared up. How lucky were we? About to embark on four years of the best education in the world? How blessed were we?

I floated through my freshman and most of my sophomore years. I took classes that looked interesting and eventually decided to major in psychology and minor in religious studies. I limited myself to one religious studies class per quarter because they always make me think, a lot. Winter quarter of my sophomore year my world was rocked when I took a class on Spirituality and Social Transformations. We learned about Cesar Chavez and Martin Luther King, read Reinhold Niebuhr and Dorothy Day. While I was inspired by these people, a creeping sense of guilt began to infiltrate my mind. And it grew. I asked myself, what am I doing for this world? What am I doing, sitting in a classroom? How am I serving as a student? Is this selfish? The gratitude I once felt for my experience had waned significantly and was being slowly replaced by a fear that I did somehow not deserve it.

God and I talked a lot that quarter. We talked when I got emails about the Peace Corps (“God, wait, is this a sign?”), we talked when I had a fantastic conversation with a peer (“God, thank you so much sending me here”), and we talked when I got scared, (“God, what am I going to do with a degree in psychology and religious studies?? This is so impractical!”). In a school where the spiritual is swept under the rug, my friends had trouble understanding why I was questioning my time here. They told me, “you are going to have a Stanford diploma. That’s worth a lot! Just be happy.”

But God was patient with me, and he had a lesson in mind. In an effort to start serving more, I started tutoring a child from East Palo Alto twice a week and I marveled at his progress. He really struggled with fractions. One day, after a rough tutoring session he came up to me with a note. It said, “Dear Cate, you make me feel: $\frac{1}{2} + 1/2 = \text{whole}$”.

As I biked home I thought about my purpose here. It hit me slowly. This education here is a gift of freedom. I have the freedom to choose how I am educated. What classes I take, who I befriend, how I participate. This tutee reminded me that we can interact with the world in a positive way wherever we go, and wherever we are.

My choices in my education will shape me into a tool to make this world a better place. What a gift. My responsibility? It is to learn well. At Stanford we are learning knowledge more often than practical, how-to skills, and it is because this school and its leaders trust us to take this knowledge and figure out the how-tos. For me, that means turning to God. When I turn to God, here I am, back at square one. Gratitude.

I’m grateful that I have the freedom to explore and seek out this education. It isn’t selfish, it is a gift. The person I become is someone who does want to give back, who will want to give back. The only thing I can do is do this well. Learn well. Use that freedom well. And I will grow into the person that he wants, he intended. And for that, I am incredibly grateful.
